In 1787, Congress authorized delegates to gather in Philadelphia and recommend changes to the existing charter of government for the 13 states, the Articles of Confederation, which many Americans believed had created a weak, ineffective central government. But we don't necessarily need the Constitution.

America Does Not Understand the True Goals of the Lockdowns

Henry McKee, a California businessman, wrote a book in 1933 that melded several of the plans that had come before. To ensure that each generation have a say in the framework of the government, he proposed that the Constitution, and each one following it, expire after 19 or 20 years. In other words, the Big Four essentially stole from the government that was financing the railroad — the railroad was just an intermediary involved in the theft.
