To medicate or not to medicate? Exchange, identity and care in everyday household medication practices

Observational studies often begin by reporting a recorded correlation between a medical outcome of interest and one or a set of independent variables: lung cancer rates are higher in groups of smokers than in groups of non-smokers, liver cancer rates are higher in populations that tend to consume food that has been contaminated with aflatoxin than in populations whose food is uncontaminated, to give a few examples. The frequent confusion between cultural predispositions and cultural resources has fuelled an ideology of established cultural profiles, particularly in the field of healthcare, which legitimises differentiated access to information. As the use of medication impacts many relationships within and outside of the confines of the household, this thesis highlights the social and symbolic nature of medications.
