Mn/Model Final Report Chapter 5: The Archaeological Database

Peebles, personal communication, 2002; Scott Newman, personal communication, 2002. Eventually, the APM, which is housed in the Office of State Archaeology located within the state's HPO, will be developed for the entire state of North Carolina. Pending archaeological clearance can result in the postponement or exclusion of effective seeding practices, which in turn can result in poor seed establishment, increased weeds, recurrent fire, accelerated soil erosion, and damage to cultural sites.

Field evaluations of this kind help to define the character and extent of any remains that exist in the area of a proposed development, and thus indicate the strength of the case for preservation. They may also wish to impose planning conditions designed to protect remains or their setting; to secure archaeological excavation prior to development commencing or, if the expectation of archaeological deposits is limited, to ensure arrangements are made for a watching brief before and during the construction period and to secure appropriate recording of such work and the provision for analysis and publication of results. Some development proposals with archaeological implications will benefit from permitted development rights.

Understanding and closing the gaps

As such, it considers key themes relating to the definition and significance of lithic sites; the means to identify, assess, evaluate and excavate them; and their mitigation and management. Researchers will be able to undertake preliminary work without the need to travel to Hull and Skipton to visit the collections in person to select the items they may wish to view at a later date.

This process reduces subsequent laboratory analysis time and curation costs. That is, the Away-from-Water parcels are on upland locations or along bodies of water less than 40 acres in size.

Mn/Model Final Report Chapter 5: The Archaeological Database

Because of the simplistic nature of the models, some installations have added judgmental criteria into their models to increase their accuracy; even though by doing so they reduce their systematic and objective character. The recent recognition of cryptotephra deposits provides an expanded series of volcanic ash isochrons for potential synchronisation of environmental and archaeological records in the Lateglacial and Early Holocene. Both these windows can be moved and re-sized according to the needs of the user.

Chapter Four

Another benefit of the data being held centrally is that it then does not need to be a static catalogue. There are a number of challenges that those dealing with the Mesolithic have to face Spikins 2010.
