The group's adoption of the name Islamic State led to controversy due to the inference that it represented the or was a , leading to outlets choosing to retain the acronyms ISIS or ISIL, or using qualifiers on the new name. By the end of the year, the plural term was in widespread use in the middle East. Confusion began when the group gained further territory and changed its name to ad-Dawlah al-Islāmiyah fī 'l-'Irāq wa-sh-Shām in April 2013 as it expanded into Syria.

Usage has not been consistent however, with ISIS, ISIL, Islamic State and Daesh all being used variously, both domestically and overseas, with the precise term chosen based on the audience, recognising the need for consistency and that the American public was more familiar with ISIL, while also catering to partners who are more attached to Daesh. It does not uppercase acronyms. According to Associate Press reporting the words of residents of Mosul in Iraq who were speaking on condition of anonymity, the group itself wishes to be referred by its full name only, Islamic State, considering the acronym Daesh to be disrespectful, going so far as to threaten to cut the tongue out of anyone who used it in public.

Names of the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant

According to the American commander of the US mission in Iraq and Syria, Lt Gen , the Arab coalition partners believed strongly that the US should avoid referring to the enemy as ISIL and instead use Daesh, to avoid giving legitimacy to the group's aims. Writing in , assistant secretary general of the Muslim Council of Britain, , argued that daesh is preferable to allowing the group to be able to use its preferred name, pointing out there were various inconsistencies in the BBC's and other outlets choice not to translate the names of other groups, and pointing out that is also an unofficial pejorative name.
