The Psychologizing of Modernity: Art, Architecture and History by Mark Jarzombek

But the architecture is a particularly strong player, and the materials that were chosen, and how the materials are used and shaped around you. Or even the anguish of a Kurosawa film? When is it that we, as historians and historiographers, may be allowed to study and not uncritically or with feigned objectivity the physical and conceptual remains of the particular mode of human intelligence that we were trained to undertake? But some architects will very clearly use psychology as a way to begin to understand the manipulative aspect of the people that are using it.

So we can feel a sense of exhaustion by walking up a long staircase, or we can feel a sense of community by walking into a space where there are chairs and tables. How does architecture manipulate our perception? Is not the latter, in fact, a vital heuristic source in its own right even when one views it less disdainfully? So art, and architecture particularly, already in the early 20th century, but particularly in the fifties and sixties, sort of embraced this problem.

In good all round condition. Do you use those operations to produce a certain type of architectural affect, or do you design a building and then in some sense forget that there are effects that you produced through certain types of manipulations? Before picking this up, be sure to don an ordnance disposal protective suit because it is deeply toxic to clear thinking, logical inference and disinterested scholarship. I would say, by the time we got to the seventies and eighties it was realized that it was harder to play the game than one would expect it.

If Neo-avant-gardism, with its bad conscience and academic aloofness, has now reduced itself to a quirky phantom haunting ivory towers and Brooklyn museum corridors with boastful and often puerile inflation, will not this epistemological exegesis reviewing its trail not also tend to follow the same frenzied pattern? So in art we see the drift towards psychoanalysis which is a much more complicated, purposeful driven, subjectivist driven project, not about psychological connections, but about your own personal issues, if you will. This book has hardback covers.

But what does it mean to be modern? Analyzing the interface among psychology, art history and avant-gardist practices, he also reflects on the longevity of the myth of aesthetic individuality as it infiltrated not only avant-garde art, but also history writing.
