Love's Labour's Lost Quotes by William Shakespeare

The adaptation of Love's Labour's Lost featured a score by collaborators and. To start the scene, the Princess aims her wit at an easy target, a Forester assisting her on the hunt. Boyet enters, hugely entertained, and warns the ladies that he has overheard the gentlemen planning to visit, disguised as Russians.

'Love's labours should be lost': Maria Stepanova, Russia's next great writer

The Princess, convinced that all this wooing is done in jest, instantly resolves that she and her ladies shall put on masks and therefore make the lovers woo the wrong woman. Branagh took this insight a step further and turned the play into a musical, going much further in his adaptation of the play than he had ever done in his Shakespeare films, and risking the alienation of both audiences and serious critics. She declares a year-long period of absence between the men of Navarre and the women of France.
