Haidar Ali and Tipu Sultan and the Struggle with the Musalman Powers of the South

Unfortunately for Tipu Sultan and his people, the British had more attention and resources to invest in southern India this time around. He succeeded against them in the first war while he died of cancer during the course of the second war.

Fearful for his family, the chief surrendered, and other local leaders soon followed his example. Therefore, it cannot be accepted that he failed against the English. The Mysoreans did capture all of the British stores and baggage and killed or wounded about 500 troops, but they did not attempt to seize Madras.
