I was amazed at the reasoning which can be so unbelievably cruel and soulless. In the end, Lad is stated to have a stronger, love-based relationship with his son versus that of the pup with his mother, the temperamental Lady. Standing immovable, yet wildly excited—after the age-old fashion of the female brute for whom males battle and who knows she is to be the winner's prize—she watched every turn of the fight.

And now, instead, these deities were carrying him away to something direfully unpleasant. Pointing out that Lad had just chased off a trespasser from the Place, he fiercely argues that his dogs are his home's best protection. This story -- although admittedly much embellished -- is based on true life story of a grand collie.
