SWGFAST

Removing individual rats affects indicators of welfare in the remaining group members. While our study focused only on all-male groups of rats, thus limiting the generalisation of our findings, our results show that rats have the potential of forming non-random associations with group mates. This association index is commonly used in network analysis when observations between individuals are rarely missed during data collection , as is the case in the present study. All rats participated in the same behavioural and cognitive tests, were tested individually, and none of the tests involved any social tasks. The task of this Working Group is to jointly establish and optimize, the performance of an alternate, non-textual, encoding of XML.
