Millions of White voters are once again showing who they are

The divide between white voters with college degrees and those without, a phenomenon that had long been building, has in the Trump-era turned into a gaping rupture. In fact, despite the fact that remains one of the most direct ways for us to hold those in power to account and make incremental sociopolitical change, turnout levels have dipped as low as barely 50 percent of eligible voters in some presidential elections of the last 40 years.
