The 5th Army suffered 2,742 casualties in the vicinity of Fort Vaux from 1 to 10 June, 381 men being killed, 2,170 wounded and 191 missing. French counter-attacks on 8 and 9 June were costly failures. Poor communications meant that only then did the French High Command realise the seriousness of the attack.

DE CHEIKH HAMIDOU KANE

In March the German attacks had no advantage of surprise and faced a determined and well-supplied adversary in superior defensive positions. German attacks changed from large operations on broad fronts, to narrow-front attacks with limited objectives.

A programme had been devised by in the 1870s to build two lines of fortresses from to and from Verdun to as defensive screens and to enclose towns intended to be the bases for counter-attacks. Nivelle had been concerned about declining French morale at Verdun; after his promotion to lead the Second Army in June 1916, Défaillance, manifestations of indiscipline, occurred in five front line regiments.

Battle of Verdun

On the east bank, German attacks near Vaux reached Bois Caillette and the Vaux—Fleury railway but were then driven back by the French 5th Division. The 18 large forts and other batteries around Verdun were left with fewer than 300 guns and a small reserve of ammunition while their garrisons had been reduced to small maintenance crews. The outer forts had 79 guns in shellproof turrets and more than 200 light guns and machine-guns to protect the ditches around the forts.

Space Grotesk

Fort Souville and its approaches were bombarded with more than 300,000 shells, including about 500 360 mm 14 in shells on the fort. The 5th Army command wanted to continue the east bank offensive until a line from Ouvrage de Thiaumont, to Fleury, Fort Souville and Fort de Tavannes had been reached, while on the west bank the French would be destroyed by their own counter-attacks. French survivors engaged the attackers, yet the Germans suffered only c.
