Instead, self-defense is defined broadly by Virginia courts as the amount of force used to defend oneself that is not excessive and is reasonable in relation to the perceived threat. This is where the act of deciding a case becomes a limited form of lawmaking in itself, in that an appellate court's rulings will thereby bind itself and lower courts in future cases and therefore also implicitly binds all persons within the court's jurisdiction. Most cases are litigated in state courts and involve claims and defenses under state laws.
