Mr John Moffett has been always ready to draw my attention to new acquisitions of shushu publications.

Chinese Mathematical Astrology: Reaching out for the stars (Needham Research Institute Series)

These methods, being arcane as well as rather sophisticated, have hitherto received little attention from scholars, both traditional and modern. Certainly, the text itself does not tell us explicitly about the system, yet from the data it contains it is quite possible to trace the system employed by its sixth-century author and in the process demonstrate that it was essentially similar to that used during the time of Yang. When the state of rest reaches its limit it returns to a state of motion.

He has occupied senior academic positions in Singapore, Kuala Lumpur, Australia and Hong Kong before becoming the Director of the Needham Research Institute in 1990. The one rotating more slowly would seem to an observer on the faster wheel to be rotating in the opposite direction. In mythology and in the novels, human beings turn holy immortals and travel among the stars; in Daoism the devotee reaches out to space by imagination during meditation or in liturgy; while in the three cosmic boards the operator contacted the stars by sheer calculation.

When the xing of the month subjugates the xing of the ordinal concerned. He is an academician of the Australian Academy of Humanities, Academia Sinica and the International Euro-Asia Academy of Science. These passages seemingly have just been passed over by traditional Chinese scholars, judging from the lack of commentaries and annotations on them, where much could have been written.
