A Modest Proposal

Skeat's Specimens of English Literature, 1394-1579 Clarendon Press Series. Spenser served as his deputy, probably from this time or soon afterwards, on a salary of £7 10 s. In short it cannot be proved that Spenser wrote A View but the wealth of corroborating evidence suggests that only a bizarre series of coincidences would force scholars to attribute the work to somebody else.

Edmund Spenser

At the same time that Spenser was being used as the focus for opposition to the Stuart regime he was also being canonized

Such was the case with 1660—1731, the most famous of eighteenth-century journalists who prospered under the new system.

'The Cruell Pressure of an Enraged, Barbarous People': Irish and English Identity in Seventeenth

His son Hugoline sided with James II against William of Orange, and his estates were transferred to his cousin William after he was attainted and outlawed on 11 June 1691.

Spenser, Edmund (1552?)

However, there is corroborating evidence: Spenser is recorded delivering letters and a 'cast of falcons' to Robert Dudley, earl of Leicester, from Sir William Drury, president of Munster 8 July 1577. Robert Bowes, the English ambassador in Scotland, wrote to Lord Burghley on 1 November 1596 that James VI was extremely angry at the portrayal of his mother, Mary, queen of Scots, and her execution in book 5, canto 9.
