African Americans and the American Labor Movement

In Arkansas, these committees were dominated by white plantation owners. As soldiers returned from the war to find African Americans in many of the jobs they used to hold, the tension escalated. Once the state programs were set in motion and Supervisors deployed, the main wartime role for the Division in Washington was to watchdog local efforts and proselytize for maximum Negro war labor production and racial harmony.

Racial Conflict

The office, originally designed to help mobilize the black work force for the war effort, developed into a rudimentary economic employment opportunity agency.
