Environmental regulations that will not be affected by Brexit include the various international conventions and treaties to which the UK is a signatory in its own right, separate from its status as an EU member state. Such anecdotal data, though not robust enough to inform a strategy, provided rich descriptions and seemed to enable local partnerships to get some initial momentum for a repositioning strategy, which could lead to more purposeful market research. While this is beneficial in terms of continuity, the preservation of EU law in this way bears the risk of entrenching current regulation of environmental issues and freezing UK environmental controls and standards at a point in time.
