They are of considerable importance for any analysis of the introduction of Christianity into the country, and all examples exhibiting survival of archaeological remains are identified as nationally important.

The Home Farm of St Augustine's Abbey, Canterbury, before and after the Dissolution

This magnificent manuscript is a vulgate text of the Gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke and John and was probably brought to England by St Augustine in 597. The intercourse and favour which this abbot obtained at the court of Rome, together with the suggestions of the archbishop, highly incensed the king against him, who being softened him to his favour, and the letters in his behalf, restored him to his favor, and the monastery to its possessions, which he had seized on and retained in his hands, and a reconciliation seems likewise to have taken place between the archbishop and this abbot; after which, I find the latter making fine to the king for a perambulation of his barony.
