And so, in a post-crisis world, the SEC must renew its focus on financial reporting and accounting so that investors and regulators receive the accurate information that sustains our markets. Finally, the change in stockholders' equity may be reported. We also charged BP with misleading investors during the Deepwater Horizon oil spill by significantly understating the oil flow rate in multiple reports filed with the SEC.

We still want to achieve settlements promptly where we can and we do not believe this new policy will necessarily change that. So, such financial investment should be preceded by a good homework and analysis of the financial records. And we will continue to pursue actions against individuals and entities that ignore inconvenient truths about losses and the need to increase reserves.

With bright students I use it with second- or third-year law students , you can do a whole course from the standing start. This could include matters involving a large number of harmed investors, where the conduct presented a significant risk to the market, where admissions would safeguard the investing public from risks posed by defendants, and where a recitation of unambiguous facts is important to send a message to the market about a particular case. I generally like to say that the SEC is back and better than ever — and that certainly is the case when it comes to pursuing financial reporting and accounting fraud.

But I guess it is all about context — you definitely take that kind of press whenever you can get it. There were many reasons for that, including that such a unit would need to be very large, would have to include many lawyers and accountants, and that accounting fraud cases are the bread and butter of many different parts of the Division.
