The weasel-faced one sports enough facial piercings to set off every metal detector in Metro airport and skinny arms wallpapered with tattoos. I doze intermittently, standing up. He leaves, as always, with a wink and a toothy grin, his heavy laugh hanging in the air long after the door has closed on his back.

Seven Eleven

. He curdles my stomach by nuking a hot dog in the microwave, splooging it with yellow gunk from the cheese pump, and scarfing it down in front of me.

The driver is Hampton, a black man in his late fifties with a shaved head and a shock-white goatee. Hampton flashes a smile crammed with teeth, cracks jokes with me, palms me blurry photographs of his grandkids grinning at the camera, eyes red-shot from the flash.

Seven Eleven

The shoplifters have stolen and gone. The newspaper truck clatters into the parking lot.

Seven Eleven

Meanwhile, shuffling between the aisles, the Strange Old Lady with the grey babushka and the soft brown moustache mutters to herself in some ancient dialect of Polish. His pals, meanwhile, are dry-humping the video game machine and he slouches over to join them. When he punches out as a delivery driver, Hampton punches in at his other job at the Ford stamping plant.

Seven Eleven

My college books are under the counter, but who can think at this hour? Again, I feel that familiar tightening in my guts.

I take the crumpled bills from fingers stained with nicotine and diesel oil, avoiding eyes that have that long-distance, interstate stare. As though rehearsed, once in the store they split up and disappear down separate aisles.

Seven Eleven

He chews slack-jawed and open-mouthed, masticated food rolling around on his tongue, then shoves a fistful of grubby bills across the counter and belches in my face as I take the money. The door chimes and the Three Dudes slide in: a hoodie, a baseball cap turned backwards and a puffy coat. She takes down yet another loaf, flattens it in both chubby hands, then shoves the mangled loaf back on the shelf and takes down another one.
