Decentralization's impact on the health workforce: Perspectives of managers, workers and national leaders

Because governments have a unique role in assuring the conditions for health of the population and because health is a public good, the high level of interdependence of federal and state governments in achieving national health goals such as those articulated in Healthy People 2010 DHHS, 2000 requires effective communication and collaboration. As part of their communications toolkit, Cornwall Council created a plain English guide to the Cornwall devolution detailing exactly what devolution meant for specific devolved areas such as business support and rates, health and social care, and transport.

Lessons learned in communicating devolution

Current estimates indicate that approximately 450,000 individuals are working in salaried public health positions, with many more contributing to this mission through nongovernmental organizations or on a voluntary basis HRSA, 2000.

DOH Devolution

Driven by advances in technology, changes in media consumption patterns and communications preferences, there is now an increasing expectation for a personalised, multi-channel, always-on communications approach.

DOH Devolution

Local managers' capacity to respond to these and other performance gaps through training is, however, restricted.
