For community-engaged initiatives, formative and process evaluation can include evaluation of the process by which partnerships are created and maintained and ultimately succeed in functioning. This type of evaluation needs to identify the relevant community and establish its perspectives so that the views of engagement leaders and all the important components of the community are used to identify areas for improvement. The guide aims to support decision making throughout the process of an evaluation, from planning its purpose and scope, designing it, conducting it, reporting findings and supporting use of its findings.

Where can I learn about nonprofit program evaluation?

Impact Evaluation An impact evaluation is a subset of an outcome evaluation. It aims to provide an analytic and rational basis for programme decision-making, based on a cycle of planning, structuring, implementing and reviewing and revising decisions, each examined through a different aspect of evaluation — context, input, process and product evaluation.

The Program Manager's Guide to Evaluation, Second Edition

One strategy to engage stakeholders in community programs and evaluations is to establish a community advisory board to oversee programs and evaluation activities in the community. The results of evaluation are often used by stakeholders to improve or increase capacity of the program or activity. Goals must be related to the program's activities, talents, resources and scope of capability- in short the goals formulated must be realistic.
