Proposed Golf Course Development

If there is no approved plan within three years, the city can require Westside to return the property to an 18-hole golf course according to the terms of the settlement agreement.

Pulte Homes eyes Pebble Creek course for new development

Opponents of developing the 155-acre Park Hill Golf Course property have sued the City of Denver, arguing that the city has been violating provisions of the conservation easement that applies to the land. The City Council does not have discretion to deny a final plat application that complies with the approved preliminary plat. Another trend is the adjustable driver, which gives the golfer the ability to adjust the weight of their driver.

As the law currently stands, in order to develop the property Westside will eventually need to ask the City of Denver to lift the conservation easement that's been attached to it since 1997.

Park Hill Golf Course Area Visioning Process

In order to lift that easement, the city would need to ask a court to terminate the easement, and then Denver City Council would need to approve lifting it. See the changes on our current public order.

Hercules redevelopment to break ground in spring

There was little development and advancement for the next few decades. Golf course assessment and cleanup can be complex, time-consuming and expensive. Ultimately, after years of waiting in the second attempt, Pettinaro decided it was best to move forward.
