Presentation at the symposium Language at the mid-level of understanding: The curious case of linguistic representations, Petar Milin and Dagmar Divjak Co-organizers. In November 2000, the district court found that five vestiges of segregation existed in YPS as of 1997: 1 disproportionate academic tracking of minority students into the least demanding classes; 2 disproportionately high discipline of minority students; 3 disproportionately high referrals of minorities to special education; 4 inadequate pupil personnel services; and 5 inadequate services for limited-English-proficient students. As a result, the United States negotiated , which were approved by the Court on August 11, 2003.
