I think there is a direct relationship between these actions. As to the question of the stocks of porpoises currently taken, and for the most part released by the commercial tuna fleet, it is the feeling of the Committee that there is little information today and that a great deal must be learned. The 1969 report referred to appears at the close of Mr.

Despite reliance for a number of years on currently established international law, unquestionably some day new detailed rules inll he needed. Now who do you know in a civilian capacity enlists in anything? Is it too much to hope that maybe the American Bar Association through its appropriate committee would study that problem and maybe pass a resolution expressing its thoughts on that matter? We should not commence commercial warfare, but if others inflict injuries upon us we must not shrink from vigorously protecting our own interests.
