Bright to Seward, 11 January 1866; Autograph Letter, Signed. Living abroad for many years in his career, it is not strange that a list of his friends should be a roll call of the leaders of his time, American, British, European. The sense of things gone wrong and of impending doom that emerges in this conventional acknowledgment also marks other of Bright's judgments in later years.

Lincoln and Chase, a Reappraisal

Bright's introduction was actually no introduction at all; it was composed as a letter to the publisher, who included it not because it illuminated Douglass's life, but because Bright besides being an associate of Douglass had become by this time a national institution whose name could be counted upon to sell books. Thurlow Weed, Secretary Seward's political alter ego and a leading figure among New York's Republicans, made an interesting comment on this point.
