The Battle for the Elephant

Southwark Council sold it to Lend Lease, a private developer that is building Elephant Park, a residential village of towers and plazas, where a three-bed apartment costs £2. In the 1960s, British rail began to phase out steam engines in favour of diesel locomotives. The Elephant and Castle was among these.

Elephant and Castle a Reconstruction by Hutchinson R C

Comparing this footage to Euston as it is today, it is surprising to see just how little the station has actually changed although posters are now written in post-decimal currency! Every allowance must be made for the difficulties of an opening night. This included dealing with depressed housing stock and providing open space. At a micro scale guerrilla gardening solves some of this abuse, with small public spaces such as the beds outside Perronet House, the playground within the Hayles Estate or tree pits up London Road.

1960s Architecture

Its eyes have the blaze of street stalls, eel stands, pintable arcades and chestnut cans. The next completed building at Site 2, Alexander Fleming House, by Erno Goldfinger in 1963, received similar praise in the Architectural Review Erno Goldfinger took much interest in the Elephant and Castle. In 1963 the Buchanan report on Traffic in Towns was published.

Paolozzi 1924-2005 was a Scotsman; born in 1920s Edinburgh to Italian immigrants. However, in 2009 refurbishment work was carried out again to the building and the Coronet Theatre, as it was then called, was looking a lot more healthy. The result was a narrower rebuilt pub of 1898 see fig.

Elephant and Castle by R C Hutchinson

What begins as good intentions and youthful hopefulness turns into bitter resentment and staunch arrogance only to find that redemption, perhaps a little too late.
