Nevertheless, the practice of making daily offerings into the domestic fire may go back to Rgvedic times. It was, however, quite distinct from the fire of the grhapatt or garhapatyagnt, which is mentioned in connection with the seasonal soma sacrifice in a Rgvedic hymn addressed to the personified season Rtu. The clue to the original significance of grhapatt may be found in the sattra sacrifices. These are collective sacrifices to be performed by a band of sacrificers between the age of seventeen and twenty-four in company with their wives, who are given dtksa along with their husbands. In a sattra sacrifice there are no priests, the yajamanas or the sacrificers themselves act as priests and they choose one among them as their grha pan to perform all the necessary sacred acts in the course of the sacrifice, others merely touching him. Nevertheless, the merit accruing out of the sacrifice is supposed to go to all of them equally.
