Biggest Dams in the U.S.

Reconciling irrigated food production with environmental flows for Sustainable Development Goals implementation. The concept of river basin planning blossomed under President Franklin Roosevelt, whose New Deal policies supported large-scale public works projects, inland navigation on reservoirs created by dams, and irrigation of dry lands with water impounded behind storage reservoirs.

Hoover Dam

It was built using stones from the chimney of a home where Ingles lived after her return in 1755.

Three Gorges Dam

Willkie ran for president as the Republican nominee in 1940. In addition to the Wilson Dam, the Act gave TVA the authority to acquire lands along the Tennessee River and any of its tributaries for the construction of future dams, reservoirs, transmission lines or power plants. Development of a global inundation map at high spatial resolution from topographic downscaling of coarse-scale remote sensing data.

Big Dams, big trouble

We can not afford needlessly to sacrifice power to irrigation, or irrigation to domestic water supply, when by taking thought we may have all three.
