community from the incursions of the state.

Mahallah

Before the establishment of the rule in central Asia, mahallas fulfilled local self-government functions connecting the private sphere with the public sphere. Thus, they are formal structures run by committees and once again regulated by the government.

Mahallah

Mahalla level state-society relationships were more complex, however, as their leaders could serve as henchmen as well as act as buffers between the local community and the state. Mahallas are directly subordinate to a and a territorial. Mahallas are a common unit not only in Uzbekistan, but in Tajikistani cities like and Kyrgyzstani cities like.
