Charles Dickens

There, Esther meets Lady Dedlock for the first time and feels a strange connection to her.

They live a happy and modest life together, and Esther is eternally grateful for all the love she has received. If not, will Dr Woodcote still marry her? Tulkinghorn, a reserved, steely man, explains that an anonymous law writer penned the document. Nowhere else perhaps in fiction, and certainly nowhere else in Dickens, is the mere female paradox so well epitomised, the unjust use of words covering so much capacity for a justice of ultimate estimate; the seeming irresponsibility in language concealing such a fixed and pitiless sense of responsibility about things; the air of being always at daggers-drawn with her own kindred, yet the confession of incurable kinship implied in pride and shame; and, above all, that thirst for order and beauty as for something physical; that strange female power of hating ugliness and waste as good men can only hate sin and bad men virtue.

Bleak House Quotes by Charles Dickens

Writing for newspaper, criticised the programme sight unseen. Lady Dedlock seems to have been behind the conspiracy; hence her walking up and down the grounds at Chesney Wold late into the evening of the night of the shooting in a preoccupied manner.
