The frame was hence cheap, enabling economies in the cost of materials to be transferred to improving the spaces within the building. As a result of the older presenters the tastes, habits, experiences, priorities and perspectives on life of the millennial generation were likely not properly understood or appreciated.

Like the notion of overlapping what were in fact mutually influential infrastructures from the different decades, the design of the Venice pavilion and its subsequent iterations reacted to both its emerging contents and the method of their structuring.

Introduction

There is now a heavy focus on live and playback of in-studio video and while this is proving popular as it gives radio a visual element it is not exactly novel and could become repetitive before long. This has much to do with the financial cost associated with installing several cameras and refitting studio interiors.

Introduction

Presenting content chronologically, the flow of space allowed by the frame sought to collapse episodes over time to convey the nested and symbiotic nature of infrastructural production.

Introduction

This case study not only illustrates how resourceful and responsive radio stations can be, but on a larger scale also serves to reinforce the core qualities of radio as a highly resilient, flexible and adaptable medium that can survive adversity. The television building designed by Ronnie Tallon of Scott Tallon Walker for the Irish national broadcasters, RTE, was another notable influence. Close examination of the listenership figures offered by the Joint National Listenership Research JNLR was also involved.
