It seems reasonable to assume that in this iconographic context such prominent textiles would have carried symbolic significance in the eyes of Byzantine viewers; and like the other textiles discussed above, they could have been associated with the Incarnation as the investiture of the Logos in the mantle of human flesh woven by the Virgin. See the scholarship by Papastavrou n36 above for a discussion of symbolic curtain veils in Annunciation images. The column on the left, for example, has a green shaft that echoes the green trunk of the tree on the right the latter a rather unusual chromatic choice, since most trees in the Chora mosaics have brown or gray trunks that stand out from the foliage.
