Sources other than the text inform us that Aeschylus gave Niobe fourteen children, a number adopted by Euripides and Aristophanes; whereas, apart from other variations in the tradition, Homer states that they were twelve, Hesiod twenty, equally divided as to sex. Dion omits to tell how Odysseus secured the arms — whether this was done first by treason as was done by Neoptolemus in Sophocles and then by persuading the hero that his bow was necessary to the success of the Greeks. Fragments from other of Aeschylus' plays have survived in quotations, and more continue to be discovered on Egyptian. Ascribed to this play by Schütz.
